The story unfolds in the Indraprastha Book Library, where his father works. This environment, filled with the comforting scent of paper and ink, contrasts sharply with the boy's experience of bullying and social isolation. Despite his tall frame and thick glasses, which do not align with his mother's belief in his attractiveness, the warmth of their unconventional family ties is evident.

The boy is particularly engrossed in a touching narrative about a father and daughter embarking on a road trip following the death of the mother—a theme that resonates deeply with him given his own apprehensions about leaving home for an exciting job opportunity. His conversations with Asha, a long-time library employee, reveal a mix of irony and nostalgia as he reflects on the decline of young readers, further illuminating his insecurities and introspective nature.

As he prepares to leave the library, affectionate banter with his father underscores their close relationship, even amid underlying tensions regarding his departure. The impending change weighs heavily on his mother, who fears losing her son and expresses her anxiety about his safety and well-being in a new environment. Her emotional response, tinged with
